Jude Hassan was an ordinary, all-American kid with two devoted parents who gave him everything he needed, especially a loving home. But at fourteen, when his family moved from the city to a quiet suburban town outside St. Louis, his world shifted. For the first time, Jude was the new kid—an outsider trying to find his footing.

Despite the upheaval, he kept earning straight A’s and excelled in sports. So when a fellow student invited him to a party, he was nervous but eager to finally feel like he belonged. That night, Jude was introduced to marijuana—a moment that would unknowingly alter the course of his life.

Within weeks, curiosity and vulnerability pulled him toward harder substances, including prescription pills. By his sophomore year, he was introduced to heroin, and nothing was ever the same. His life began to unravel piece by piece.
